If a simile cluster is defined as a grouping of at least three long similes within thirty lines, all of which are focused on a single scene, then there are only three other identifiable simile clusters. In book 11 after Agamemnon departs wounded from the battle (280–83), Hector advances for the day of glory promised by Zeus. To mark Hector's entrance Homer employs a cluster of four similes, both short and extended:

292: a hunter sets his hounds on a boar or lion
295: Ares, the destroyer of men (short)
297: a blustering wind churns the sea
305: two winds clash, raise heavy swells, and the waves scatter spray

Second, in book 15 when the Trojans are on the verge of burning the Greek ships, thus fulfilling the plan of Zeus and putting crucial pressure on Achilles (592ff.), there is a cluster of six similes, two of which are short comparisons:

592: the Trojans are like flesh-eating lions (short)
605: Hector is like Ares (short) or a destructive fire (extended)
618: the Greeks remain fixed like a cliff that is battered by wind and waves
624: Hector attacks the Greeks like a wave that so threatens to sink a ship that the sailors barely escape death
630: Hector attacks like a lion that harasses the inexperienced herdsman<sup>35</sup> and kills a heifer, scattering the herd

The third cluster falls at the end of book 17 and describes Menelaus' and Meriones' struggle to remove the body of Patroclus to the Greek camp. In this passage similes respond to the balanced battle between Greeks and Trojans:

725: hounds (Trojans) viciously attack a wounded boar (the two Ajaxes) that scares them away when he turns to fight
737: a fierce fire (Trojans) is driven against a city by the wind and destroys it
742: two mules (Menelaus and Meriones) drag a large beam along a rugged path
747: a ridge (Ajaxes) holds back several rivers (Trojans) that threaten to burst through 755: a falcon (Aeneas and Hector) attacks smaller birds (Greeks), bringing the threat of death

These four passages in books 2, 11, 15, and 17 establish the simile cluster as a form familiar to the poet. Two rules prevail in such clusters:
